There few good books on marketing/consumer behavior in China, but this is definitely one of them. Part 1 of the book deals with the historical and cultural background of the Chinese people. It gives invaluable insights into the factors that make Chinese people different from Western people in their consumer behavior. This is something that many Western companies neglect when they come to the Middle Kingdom, simply attempting to roll-out existing strategies from home. This might well be my favorite part of the book. The second part of the book describes how in the recent decade the Chinese consumption economy exploded and how consumers are changing. It looks at different trends in e-commerce, tourism, luxury buying, etc. I especially found that the chapters on segmentation and marketing offered some excellent insights. So why didn't I give it 5 stars? Well, the book has a few flaws. First of all, although there are quite a few cases in the book, some of the more elaborate cases in the marketing section of the book mainly discuss Chinese companies that have been successful in China and abroad (Lenovo, Weibo, OCT Mami). I would have liked to see a few more cases of successful Western companies in China. I also found the Microsoft case at the end of the book rather unconvincing, especially since the recent government leanings towards homebred hard- and software are mentioned nowhere. Second, the chapter on e-commerce - one of the areas that interests me most - is rather superficial and already outdated. Of course this can hardly be avoided with the pace of online developments, but considering the importance of online shopping in China I had hoped for some new information I wasn't aware of yet. Third, there are a few incorrect facts.
